Colorectal Cancer in Clinical Practice Stephen J Spann MD

Colorectal cancer is one of the major malignancies affecting westernized societies, both in terms of incidence and as a cause of mortality, but it is a preventable and a detectable disease. Although most countries do not actively promote preventive policies, this trend is gradually changing. In line with this development, Colorectal Cancer in Clinical Practice examines prevention and early detection of this disease, and it discusses management issues. It provides the clinician with an accessible and up-to-date guide on the primary and secondary prevention of colorectal cancer, and it is of particular interest to primary care physicians and specialists in gastroenterology, oncology and surgery.
