Interview with PJ McDermott

Q. What prompted you to write a scifi fantasy novel?

The inspiration came from a TV news report on the discovery of an ancient tomb in Jerusalem that some scientists thought to contain the remains of Jesus Christ and his family. (This was later disproved.)

I began to hypothesize about the contents of the tomb, and the story came alive.

I love writing writing science fiction and get a real kick out of conjuring up colourful characters and futuristic plots. This novel blends elements of science fiction, theology and exploration in a strangely alluring way, and includes a quest to defeat evil, terrifying creatures, an epic journey, and gigantic battle scenes.

Q. What is the greatest joy of writing for you?

I'm fascinated by world building, whether on Earth or in outer space. Science Fiction is the perfect vehicle for expressing my creativity as a writer. I also like to experience things through the eyes and actions of characters that have strong personalities. Avanaux takes place in Earth's post-apocalyptic future, and Hickory is a female lead with some serious father issues. Blending in a lot of personal detail about my science fiction heroine helps the reader relate to her better and also builds an engaging story.

Q. What do your fans mean to you?

Everything! Without an audience for my work, what is the point? The more fans I have, the better I'll write.

Q. What are you working on next?

The first two books in my scifi fantasy adventure trilogy, Avanaux, and Rise of the Erlachi have been published. I'm now working on book 3, a blockbuster conclusion which will be released mid-2016.

Q. Who is your favorite author?

Not an easy question to answer. There are so many! I enjoy reading all kinds of science fiction. As a schoolboy, I read scifi stories morning, noon and night. Authors such as Asimov, H.G. Wells, Herbert, Niven, Moorcock and Le Guin have all had a great influence on my writing.
